

Abstract of Disclosure

A cryogenic power conditioning system for fuel cells is proposed which is cooled by liquid hydrogen or liquid natural gas (methane) used to power these fuel cells, or by liquid nitrogen supplied by high-temperature superconducting cables. The main applications are in large vehicles such as transit buses. The result is a combined motor and motor-drive system exhibiting higher efficiency, lower weight, smaller size and lower cost.